Rejuvenating The Karura Forest: Danger Spots to Green Haven

Speaker: Mrs Alice Macaire, Chair, The Friends Of Karura Forest

6:15 pm, Louis Leakey Auditorium, Nairobi National Museum

Donation: Ksh 500, Students Ksh 200

Refreshments at 6.00 pm

Doors open at 7.00

Where in Nairobi can you find...

...a 20-meter waterfall and Mau Mau caves, wetlands, a lily-strewn lake, antelopes and butterflies in grassy glades, bamboo groves, three rivers to explore, 50K of trails for bird walks or jogging, pleasant picnic grounds and ideal sites for teambuilding, exercising or a wedding?

Answer: The Karura Forest.

And it's 15 minutes from Nairobi's city centre.

The Karura Forest conservation project started in 2007 after the Forest was rescued from redevelopment through the actions of Prof Wangari Maathai. Since then, the Friends of Karura Forest has been working in conjunction with the Kenya Forestry Service, the local communities of Karura and Huramu, and the families who live within the forest to create a safe, secure and educational environment for all to enjoy. The Forest has transformed from a notorious "no go" zone to a "green lung," one of the largest gazetted forests in the world fully within a city limits.

Dr. Kyongo and the new metal shelves

Protecting a 60-year investment in world-rekknowned replicas

KMS funds shelving for the NMK Casting Department

By Benson Kyongo Casting Department head

The Casting Department was established in 1963 as an answer to a pressing need at the museum. The National Museums of Kenya have the finest collection in the world of hominid fossils, along with many other examples of African flora and fauna. There is a tremendous demand from researchers around the world to study these artifacts. But original fossil skulls and bones are both too valuable and too fragile to handle frequently. So the Casting Department produces precise casts—or replicas—of these fossils that can be sent to other researchers for study.

These casts are not “counterfeits,” but precise, detailed, scientifically accepted replicas.

KMS GRANTS

The Casting Department is an investment by the museum, because it generates revenue from cast sales. Clients across the globe include museums, universities, individual researchers and other related institutions.

The department also provides exhibition replicas to NMK galleries around Kenya. Some of our recent work is included in displays on human evolution and large mammals in the Nairobi Museum.

In 1967, the first two Kenyan casting trainees were recruited, Mr. Simon Kasinga and Mr. Kasilu. In 1977 they were both sent to the U.S. for specialized technical training. After training, they became internal trainers at the department.

The department is expecting new technology donated by the Japan International Cooperation Agency to assist us in the many activities we undertake.

To produce a cast, one begins by making a mold. Every cast produced has a mold. Once it is made, the mold will be used to reproduce subsequent casts without reusing the original specimen.

All the molds are catalogued with accession and shelf numbers. Over the years, we have built many thousands of molds for various purposes.

One of our challenges has been the safe-keeping of these important objects. Dust reduces the life of a mold. With our wooden shelving from the 1960s, it was very difficult to keep out the dust. By 2010, dust and wood breakage were regular visitors to the department. We feared that this would be a continuing routine.

But after touring the facility, the Kenya Museum Society stepped in with a grant to provide new metal shelving, protecting the nearly 60 years of investment in molds and casts that NMK has made. I cannot forget energetic KMS Chair Pat Jentz who, despite her busy schedule, spent time with me in the lab, taking floor measurements, marking the areas, looking for a company to do the work and getting bids. I'm very grateful for her hard work.

The project has two phases. The first is complete, and the second is now underway.

I'd also like to thank all the KMS committee officials, members, staff and others who contributed in so many ways. We are very grateful. We also had the full support and blessing of NMK Director General Dr. Idle Farah, who took time from his busy schedule to help with fundraising. We also had great support from the Directorate Director Connie Maina. On behalf of the casting department and NMK as a whole, we are honored. Again I say, "Thanks."

KMS, keep the spirit.

Tales of Joy

Magado Crater, Nyambeni Hills and Joy's Camp in the Shaba Nature Preserve

by Barbara Steenstrup

Three high points of this trip: there are no baboons or annoying monkeys at Joy's Camp; we celebrated Narinder's birthday; and Narinder told us of the life and loves of Joy Adamson, along with her contribution to the conservation and documentation of Kenya's tribes and flora. Joy's Camp, a Cheli and Peacock property situated at the site of Joy Adamson's original camp, was a delight in every way.

It was a six-hour drive from Nairobi to our first destination, the Sarova Shaba Lodge. Sadly, the high standards at the lodge experienced during previous trips have fallen—lunch was fine, but the recycled leftovers for dinner were not a hit. Breakfast, with rock-hard croissants, was not a success either. There was also an oversupply of monkeys.

Thereafter, the wildlife, including a magnificent cheetah in plain view for a long time, during a half-day game drive in Samburu, the doum palms, the accommodation at Joy's Camp at the other end of Shaba, the Italian influenced meals, and the ambience were outstanding. Our twenty participants filled all ten tents. Some of us did game drives in the mornings and walks in the afternoons. Some did game drives and lounged by the pool in the afternoon. Many napped during the heat of the day.

One morning, we all drove to the Magado Crater in the Nyambeni Hills. It was an amazing outing, a soda lake that some of us viewed after climbing to a panoramic view while others went down to the lake floor itself. At the bottom of the crater is a small lake that evaporates to form a soda salt crust. “The Meru people apparently have been collecting soda in this crater for thousands of years,” according to Volcano World researchers at Oregon State University. “In recent years, the Meru as well as the Boran and Somali people have shared the crater. During the rainy season, the people water their cattle in this natural collecting basin. During the dry season as the full lake recedes, the soda that remains behind is collected.” (Photo at left from volcano.oregonstate.edu/vwdocs/volc_images/africa/magado_crater.html)

I met Joseph, an elderly Meru soda gatherer. He showed me his cache of soda wrapped in dried banana leaves. He explained that he spends three days at a time in a shelter of branches he builds in the crevices of the hills. He watched as I, a bit stiff-kneed, climbed in the rocks. To ease my progress, Joseph very kindly brought me a walking stick he had stored in his shelter.

Some members continued to Chanler’s Falls, named after the young American adventurer who first recorded them. The water originates in 24 springs (now fenced) and crashes over a black lava flow where it has dug a deep gorge. Some young men offered to take us to view crocodiles but due to time constraints we couldn’t.

JOY ADAMSON

Joy Adamson’s maiden name was Friederike Victoria Gessner. Her second husband Peter Bally gave her the nickname Joy, which stuck with her considerably longer than Peter did. Adamson was her third husband, George. The 100th anniversary of her birth was celebrated in 2010. Joy is credited with having Shaba gazetted as a national reserve.

Adamson came to worldwide attention as a result of her 1960 book Born Free, chronicling Joy and George’s efforts to reintroduce the orphaned lioness Elsa back into the wild. The book was made into a hit movie in 1966.

The Adamsons pioneered techniques for reintroducing big cats. Elsa is believed to be the first successful lion reintroduction.

Narinder’s tales were both informative and amusing, spiced with comments about Joy’s affairs. Two participants on the trip had known her personally and added their own, little known anecdotes. We also learned from Francien van de Vijver, our charming host at Joy’s Camp, that Paul Ekai, the man who was imprisoned for the murder of Joy Adamson, visited the area recently accompanied by a journalist from the Daily Nation. There is still doubt as to whether or not Ekai is guilty.

On the trip back on Sunday, several of us stopped for lunch at the Trout Tree, 13 kilometers south of Nanyuki town. It is a lovely place. The trout is fresh from the fishponds below the restaurant.

Wajir Museum Opening

April 19, 2011

The Wajir museum, whose official opening is April 19, 2011, shows the commitment of the National Museums of Kenya to its mandate of safe guarding Kenya cultural and natural heritage.

Begun more than 100 years ago with small natural collection in a building that is now Nairobi city centre, NMK has expanded its mandate in the years since. There are now more than 20 regional museums as well as many sites and monuments throughout the country.

NMK has been focusing recently on conserving the heritage resources in the northern Kenya districts. In 2007, NMK conducted a preliminary survey to document and assess natural and cultural heritage in the larger Wajir district. This survey recommended—among other things,—the establishment of a museum and heritage coordination office in the district, as well as preservation of Quarey Wells

Wajir museum has already been established. On August 2009 an exhibition was installed and was fully completed recently. The exhibition reflects the traditions and customs of the community living in northern Kenya and North Eastern province. The theme of the exhibition is “A Window to Northern Kenya.”

The launch of this museum will open the region to tourist circuit. Wajir has a well established airport. The museum will boost the economy of the region. This is the first museum in North Eastern Province. Another will be opening in Garissa. A gazettelement notice has already been published and part development plan for the Quarey site prepared.

Wajir town host several sites and monument among them Wagalla Massacre site, Yahut Dam , Shalety Wells, historic buildings, British bunkers and tunnels, and Quarey. These are some of the significant heritage resources to be developed and safeguarded.

We at the museum recognise the vitality of active participation of all stakeholders in heritage management. We established good rapport between NMK and the local community. This launch is a true indicator that our efforts have born fruit.

The April 19 launch is the official opening of Wajir Museum. It has already received its first objective through installation of exhibition. There is a lot of enthusiasm and support both from the local leaders and the people of Wajir. This community support coupled with expertise and support from the stakeholders will mean a successful future for this museum.

Time Magazine selects Fairview Hotel as the place to stay in Nairobi

📖 Most of the international chain hotels in Nairobi manage to be both shoddy and extortionate. Independent and family-run, the Fairview is half the price of the competition (with rooms from $135) and several times as good... The gardens, the pool and the breakfasts are huge, the wi-fi is fast and free and the staff among the friendliest and most efficient in Africa. All this, plus a classy brasserie and wine bar and some of the best sushi in the city. 📖
